“White Identity Politics: The New Role of Racial Identity in America”

Ashley E. Jardina
Assistant Professor of Political Science, Duke University

Wednesday, March 20, 7:30 p.m.
School of Education Building, Room 114
Located at the corner of Spring Garden and Kenilworth Streets

 Parking is available in the Oakland Avenue Parking Deck ***

For disability accommodations, please contact Gabrielle LaMountain at g_lamoun@uncg.edu.
Ashley E. Jardina (University of Michigan Ph.D., 2014) is an Assistant Professor of Political Science at Duke University. Her research explores the nature of racial attitudes, the development of group identities, and the way in which these factors influence political preferences and behavior. She is primarily interested in how Americans are responding to increasing diversity, and her current project explores the conditions under which white racial identification and white consciousness among white Americans is a salient and significant predictor of policies, candidates, and attitudes toward racial and ethnic groups. She is also interested in the study of gender and politics.

Her dissertation won the 2015 American Political Science Association award for the best dissertation in race and ethnic politics.

The School of Education Building is located on Spring Garden Street, in between Stirling Street and Kenilworth Street on the UNCG campus. Parking is available in the Oakland Avenue Parking Deck.